

Improving Passenger Rail in Oregon

Improving passenger rail in Oregon

The Oregon Passenger Rail project is studying options for improved passenger rail service between the Columbia River in the Portland urban area and the Eugene-Springfield urban area – an approximately 125 mile segment. The Oregon Department of Transportation is in the beginning stages of a study process that will help determine a general passenger rail alignment and communities where stations will be located. The project will also determine the number of daily trips between Eugene and Portland, travel time objectives, and the technologies to be used. To learn more, visit www.OregonPassengerRail.org

Open Houses – How would you like to see passenger rail improved?

ODOT is hosting public open houses throughout Oregon in September, as well as an online open house. Join us to learn more about the Oregon Passenger Rail project, and give us your thoughts on what the future of passenger rail should look like between Portland and Eugene.
